[Effects of ethylenediamine on constituents and metabolites of plumbago in Qingdao]. A new alpine plant, Plumbago chinensis, with high content of plumbagin was cultivated in Qingdao in this paper. The growth and spatial distribution of P. chinensis in cultivated and uncultivated areas were explored in the present study. The contents of total anthraquinones in plant tissues were determined by HPLC with fluorescence detection. The results showed that the contents of total anthraquinones in plants were significantly higher in cultivated than in uncultivated areas. The spatial distribution of P. chinensis in cultivated area was generally more aggregated with frequent turns in place, while P. chinensis in uncultivated area was more dispersed and scattered. The distribution of anthraquinones in the plants was closely related to the spatial distribution of P. chinensis. The results indicate that cultivation of P. chinensis can change its spatial distribution. In addition, the effects of ethylenediamine on constituents and metabolites of P. chinensis were also discussed in this study.
