Identification and characterization of a sphinganine/sphingosine kinase, designated as SPHK, in Plasmodium falciparum. Sphingolipid metabolism has been implicated in the pathogenesis of malaria infection, and the pathogenesis of the malaria parasite Plasmodium falciparum is a particularly interesting subject. In this report, we identified a sphinganine/sphingosine kinase gene, designated as SPHK (Sphinganine/sphingosine kinase) in P. falciparum, by sequence analysis of the genomic DNA. The level of the mRNA in the asexual erythrocytic stage of the parasite was increased depending on the differentiation of the parasite, confirming the presence of SPHK activity in the malaria parasite. Yeast complementation studies showed that the recombinant SPHK protein expressed in S. cerevisiae was able to transform sphinganine into sphingosine. Sphingosine kinase activity was inhibited by sphingosine and it was activated by sphingosine-1-phosphate. High concentrations of dic c6a93da74d
